

student in school, you did your homework assignments, wrote essays, and took exams. All these things were graded and counted toward your final grade at the end of the semester. You received your graded papers back as you went along, so you knew where you stood. You knew if you were passing or if you were failing. You did not wait until the end of the year to receive your final report card with no prior feedback along the way to give you an indication of how you were doing. The letter grade that would be staring back at you as you read your report card was not a total surprise.

Can you imagine enduring an entire year of school, not knowing how you did on any of your homework or papers or tests? You just sat there, doodling on your desk, waiting in ignorance for the final grade to be delivered. Those final grades determined what college you went to or what profession you entered, but you just blindly accepted whatever your final grade card said. That kind of scenario does not make much sense, does it? And think of the times when the teacher graded something wrong that you, in fact, had correct. You were able to call it to his or her attention so the grade could be fixed. If you operated under a system where you did not get your homework back, you could not have known that there were errors that you needed to correct that affected your final grade and your future.

With any area of life, be it our education, our career, or our marriage, we need to know our progress and where we stand so we can take corrective action, if necessary. Our credit report is no exception.

What You Do First

Get your credit report. Check for any inaccuracies. Ninety percent of all credit reports have something wrong on them. If you don't ever get it and look at it, how will you ever know if something needs to be corrected? The first step to creating wealth is getting your credit report!

And once you get the report, it is critical, crucial, mega-important that you review it! Can I be any more clear? The credit score is the
