

BILL and ANDREA: TIME to GROW UP

In this chapter I would like to look at another couple. Bill and Andrea were college students in their early twenties.

Though they both came out of middle-class homes with parents who were Christians, their expectations regarding finances were quite different. Neither had ever attended a course on personal finances. Although they had both worked at a variety of summer jobs for several years, neither had more than a general idea of how to handle a checking account.

They met at a rally held by a Christian group on their college campus and kept steady company thereafter. Both Andrea and Bill were attending college on a variety of loans and grants. By their senior year, their loans totaled nearly $20,000 each. Bill knew he would be expected to begin to repay his loans after graduation, because his dad had made that clear from the beginning. Since he felt he had little choice, he continued to accumulate school loans.

Andrea and her parents never discussed the repayment of the loans she was receiving. She assumed that her dad would pay them,
