

it overdraft because he knew about Daddy's death and figured I was waiting on the insurance payment. But Andrea, I haven't used that card much at all, and it has more than four thousand dollars charged on it."

"Four thousand dollars! Mother, that's impossible," Andrea explained. "I've used it for school expenses and some clothes, but I certainly didn't charge that much!"

"And the gas card has nearly eight hundred dollars on it too, Andrea. Have you used it? There are charges on here from Virginia, Washington, and New Jersey. Did you drive to New Jersey recently?"

Andrea sat quietly for a few seconds. She was overwhelmed by the news from her mother. She had put the trip and the charges completely out of her mind during the last month. Being married was everything to her, and she and Bill had been very happy. But now she knew she had to tell her mother that they were married. "Well, Mom, I've got some news. Bill and I got married a month ago in Virginia, but we also went up to see Aunt Maye in New Jersey. That's where the gas charges came from. But don't worry, we'll pay you back."

Andrea's mother had already put two and two together and suspected something like that. After a moment she said, "That was your choice, but I wish you had at least let me know before you got married. I wish you had told me. Do Bill's parents know? They'll probably be upset if you left them out of this too, but you'll have to work that out for yourselves. You know I wish you and Bill all the best. And since your dad and I always said that when you got married you would have to manage your own household, I'm sending all the bills to you. You'll have to take care of them."

"But Mom," she pleaded, "we don't have the money to pay all the bills right now. I'm student teaching, and Bill is getting ready for his finals next month."

"I'm sorry, Andrea, but you should have considered that before you got married and ran up those bills." With that, she hung up the
