

the Lord describes a steward (a manager of another's property) who was guilty of misappropriating his master's property. When the master discovered what he had done, he determined to dismiss his steward. In an effort to maintain some security for himself, the manager negotiated with his master's clients and reduced the amounts they owed—apparently in hopes that they would pay him something later. When the master discovered that, he marveled at the ingenuity of the deceitful manager (verse 8).

Does the Lord also marvel at those who file for bankruptcy to avoid paying their creditors while holding assets that could be sold? Each Christian has to decide that issue individually. But what a shame it would be to appear before the Lord one day and learn, as Esau did, that an inheritance had been traded for a meal.

Remember, “No servant can serve two masters. Either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will be devoted to the one and despise the other. You cannot serve both God and Money” (Luke 16:13).
