

BUD and SANDI: WHERE Indulgence LEADS

Bud and Sandi Hawkins were Christians. Bud was a stockbroker and made an average annual salary that kept them very comfortable. He took care of the mortgage payments, car payments and insurance, utilities, the children's private school tuition, and his and Sandi's college loans. He figured out how much food, gasoline, clothing, and other household necessities should cost and gave Sandi that amount to manage.

Their marriage was a good one, except in the area of finances. Sandi sensed that she was not a part of any major financial decisions in either their personal lives or the business where Bud was a participating partner. With their children in school during the day, Sandi would liked to have worked part-time in Bud's office, as she had when he first started. However, the other members of the firm had established policies that prohibited the involvement of family members in the business. So Sandi kept busy with the children's activities and volunteer work through their church.

Bud seemed to have a knack for selling securities. He understood the business and his clients were happy with the job he did in
