

JACKSON and LINN: EXPECT the UNEXPECTED

Jackson and Linn came from different economic backgrounds.

Linn's mother was a stay-at-home mom, but that hardly describes her energy and passion. She volunteered in the children's wing at the local hospital twice a week, reading stories, preparing crafts, and engaging the children in activities to keep their minds and their restless bodies occupied as much as possible. When Linn was old enough, she sometimes accompanied her mother.

In the church Linn's mother was the go-to woman for anything regarding Sunday school, vacation Bible school, and curriculum for kids' and youth clubs. She called Linn her "right-hand girl" and allowed her to help in small ways from the time she was very young. As she grew older, Linn was able to be a true assistant, and began teaching her own Sunday school class when she was in high school. She discovered she was gifted in this area and determined to go to college and pursue a teaching career. And, if she happened to marry someone and have her own children someday, she would stay at home while they were young, and then, when they were in
