

school, she could return to teaching, so her schedule would coincide with theirs, and the family would be home together.

Linn's father was a successful businessman, and although he was not wealthy, he made a very comfortable living. He was also involved in the church and in community organizations, believing that to whom much was given, much was expected. Though a friendly man, he was more comfortable with administrative roles than the people-involved tasks his wife and daughter loved.

Linn was not indulged as a child, and she was expected to work to help pay her way from the time she was a teenager. Her college tuition was provided by her parents, but she was required to work summers to earn money for her books, clothes, and incidentals, which she did.

Jackson came from a much more modest background. His mother and father, both from broken homes themselves, were divorced when he was nine years old. He missed his father in the home and grew to resent being away from his friends on weekends to visit him at the apartment he now lived in. His parents both expressed their grievances against each other to him, and by the time Jackson was a teenager, he had decided he'd never get married, never wanting to put another child through the pain of a broken family.

His mother struggled financially after the divorce, and money was always in short supply in his home. As soon as he was old enough, he found jobs that provided him with spending money and enabled him to help his mother with living expenses.

Jackson's pastor helped him apply for a scholarship from his denomination to attend a Bible college. Part of the condition of the award money was that he would teach in a Christian school for at least two years, which suited Jackson fine. One of his junior high teachers had taken an interest in him and helped him through those difficult years, and Jackson later decided that he would also like to be a teacher and help kids. He worked long hours to pay his expenses during his Bible college years.