

different but essential abilities. Certainly those abilities will overlap in many areas, and often that will lead to differences of opinions. But just as certainly, without the balance that each can bring to the marriage, great errors in judgment will be made.

It has been my observation that a dominant woman operating without the balancing influence of her husband will accumulate debt through credit cards and store accounts, because she buys too many clothes or household items. A dominant husband operating without the balancing influence of his wife will accumulate debt through the purchase of a boat, motorcycle, or high-end electronics. Men don't buy very often, but when they do, they buy big.
