

daughters, Mr. Russell moved forward in his chair and made the following statement:

I have three daughters.... All have careers. All are working.... All are happy. All live a long way from here. They have their own lives to live.... I'm not worried about paying for their futures.... Nor are they. We don't discuss it. But there will be a large sum.... Plenty, I'm sure, left over after I pass away.

Another respondent, Mr. Joseph, nodded his head and stated:

We have two daughters, one is a vice president for a large corporation and the other is a scientist.... We are very proud of them.... They will be very well provided for. But as a family, we don't spend much time thinking about my estate.

Mr. Russell and Mr. Joseph have the correct formula. If you are wealthy and want your children to become happy and independent adults, minimize discussions and behavior that center on the topic of receiving other people's money.

Following these statements, one of the other respondents asked Mr. Andrews about the disposition of his business. His comments generated a series of interesting remarks from the more senior members of the group. Mr. Andrews stated:

All the money I've been making in my business I dedicate to my daughters and their children.... They don't need the money. The kids can use it. I give the maximum within the bounds of the law.

What does Mr. Andrews plan to do about ownership of his business? Will he eventually sell it? Will he give it to the children to operate? Or does he have some other idea in mind?
