

his wife drive full-sized General Motors sedans. His living and consuming habits are quite middle class. He never wears a tie or suit to work.

Mr. W. enjoys venturing into, as he calls it, luxury real estate:

I make money outside of the [equipment] business ... in real estate.... God continues to make more people, but he doesn't make any more land.... You will make money if you're smart and you're choosy where you pick the spot.

Mr. W. is very picky indeed. He buys property outright or in partnership only when the price is right. He typically purchases property or a part ownership from an owner and/or a developer who is in great need of financial assistance.

Recently he uncovered yet another “superior investment opportunity in sun country”:

Some poor guy was putting together a luxury high-rise condominium.... For a builder to build, he had to have 50 percent of the units sold.... So I went in and made a deal with him.... [I] bought all of the units of the same style ... floor plan ... with a lot of leverage, and he got his money. And he built. Because I bought all the one style, ... anybody [who] wanted to buy that style had to see me.... Like monopoly, nobody else competes with me.... I sell 'em all right out, all but one.

But Mr. W. does not even keep the one remaining unit for very long. He and his family use it for a short vacation or two. Occasionally, he invites his close friends to use it. Otherwise, he rents the remaining unit until it is sold. Why doesn't Mr. W. maintain a more permanent presence in these condominium complexes? It's not his style.

Most of the people who buy Mr. W.'s vacation condominiums are upper-middle-class UAWs. Mr. W. and many of the buyers of his condominium units have had a number of disagreements. In several of the complexes where Mr. W. previously bought units, his buyers passed so many restrictive covenants that Mr. W. was uncomfortable even
