

operate in saturated marketplaces and, more importantly, they could jeopardize your natural love for the activity.

YOUR IGNITION: MOVING FROM LOVE TO PASSION

The motivational fuel for the Fastlane is passion, not love. Passion gets you out of the garage and onto the road. If you have a passion for a specific goal, you'll do anything for it. I had a passion for Lamborghinis and was willing to do anything for it. Pick up dog shit, mop floors, work at 3 a.m.—whatever it was going to take, I had the passion to do it. Did I love driving limos? Hell no. But I had a Fastlane passion and it motivated my movement to the vision of future.

Your vehicle needs an ignition, a starter, something that compels you to jump out of bed in the morning challenged to tackle the day. That ignition is passion. You need a passion for something greater. It is different for everybody, but when you find it, you will do anything for it.

When you reposition your goals and visions at the end of a road that works, that end transforms your daily life into passionate action toward that specified destination. If you can't get paid doing some activity, identify a specific "why" or "end goal" that ignites your passion to act.

What is your WHY? Why are you doing this? Why go Fastlane? Whom do you want to prove wrong? My "WHYS" read like this:

"I want to pay off my mother's mortgage."

"I want to wake up without an alarm clock."

"I want to write a book without the pressure of money."

"I want a big house on a mountainside with a pool."

"I want a Lamborghini."

"I want to make a difference."

"I want to prove him wrong."

Passion beats "do what you love," because passion fuels motivation for something greater than yourself and is generalized. When the focus is "doing what you love," the focus becomes industry-specific and you're likely to violate the Commandment of Need. Why are you starting this business? Because you love it? Or because there is a real market need?

I repeat: Passion for an end goal, a why, drives Fastlane action.

Mike Rowe, host of the cable television show Dirty Jobs, profiled several owners of businesses who had less than lovable duties. From testing bovine manure to cleaning up pigeon goop, the owners were passionate. None of them "loved" what they did, but they had passionate "whys" and very deep bank accounts. Competition was sparse because everyone else was busy chasing "do what you love."

A formidable "why" is all you need to turn your daily activities into passionate