

And we lacked the resources to pay for a seat in the management quota. We could have just about managed that, but Bauji was not certain if the investment would be worth the money. But now that I was making decent money, Bauji saw a chance to realize his cherished dream to see at least one of his children become an engineer.

‘Lala, would it be asking for too much from you to set some money aside so that we can get admission for Satish in a decent engineering college next year?’ he asked with some hesitation.

‘For all the trouble I have caused you, that is the least I can do to make up for it,’ I told him.

He was so moved that he embraced me. I had never felt so close to him as I did in that moment.