

fact, great companies can endure difficult economic conditions. Great companies do not get disrupted by evolution in their customers' preferences or competitors or operational aspects of their business. Their management teams have strategies that deliver results better than their competition can. Often, such companies appear conservative. However, they do not confuse conservatism with complacency. These traits are rarely found outside great companies.