

Five Steps to Financial Wellbeing

member – is constantly in flux. There are things that we can do and change to be of more value to others, whether for altruistic reasons, such as giving our time or energy to someone we care about, or out of self-interest, such as increasing your value to your company or manager so that you can feel secure in your role, progress or confidently ask for a pay rise. But your worth is constant. Your worth does not depend on what you can offer to other people, how much money is in your bank account or how successfully you manage your finances. Remembering that will give you something to push off from every time you need to stand up for yourself or make difficult decisions. It will carry you through difficult times, through letting people down or disappointing yourself, and stop you from getting dragged under. It will protect you from feeling as if you need to chase whichever opportunity will give you more money and status throughout your life, and allow you to prioritize happiness and wellbeing.

It matters how we make our money, as well as how we spend it

So much of the discussion around money and self-worth focusses on how we spend it, which is certainly very important, but there is also something to be said about how we make our money, and how that relates to our feelings of self-worth. Our complex relationship with money often extends to include our relationship with work – how much we value the work that we do, the societal perception of our job, how good we think
