

How about . . . money manifesting?

Generally speaking, I am a manifesting sceptic. I recognize some of the basic principles – for example, focussing on what you want, overcoming limiting beliefs and directing your time and energy towards what serves you – to be sound, but the moment that vibrations or the universe are mentioned, I'm out. If there are crystals involved, I'm double out, and I find manifesting culture particularly problematic when promises are made around being able to manifest money. This idea has been popular for decades, with cohort after cohort of new 'gurus' or 'masters' touting the same rules, rehashed for new generations and evolving media. With the rise of social media, manifesting has found a whole new audience – and it is lucrative. According to some of those selling courses and teaching money manifestation, you actually can put a price on getting what you want, and it's usually at least a few hundred quid. In fact, one of the most concerning things about money manifesting is that, by and large, the people profiting from it are making most, if not all, of their own money from courses teaching others how to manifest money.

It's not my intention to dismiss or mock spirituality or belief, rather to advocate for critical thought when it comes to money, because I know the damage that can be done by blindly trusting that everything will be okay. Of course, if something is working for you as a way of addressing your feelings about your worth, it's important to respect and nurture that – financial wellbeing is a holistic concept that acknowledges that there is far more
