

for you to pick up on. Observe, and make a mental note each time you say thank you over the course of a day.

- Keep a gratitude journal. You don't need any special kit, just a notepad and a pen, and it can take any form that you like – free or long-form writing, bullet points or just notes in margins.
- Express your gratitude to others. If the actions of another person are the source of your gratitude, make sure that they know it, and if the source of your gratitude is abstract or inanimate (for example, a beautiful walk, a moment alone or a particularly nice sandwich), tell someone else about it.
- Pair your gratitude expressions with another habit to help you to remember – such as pelvic floor exercises. You might decide to think of or say three things that you are grateful for in the shower each morning, or while you're walking your dog, or on your commute. You might even bundle gratitude with another of your financial wellbeing habits – jotting down a few things that you are grateful for before you check your bank balance or review your budget, for example, might make it easier for you to approach those tasks without fear or anxiety.

Think about whether you want to approach gratitude more as a thinking practice or as a writing practice, and give yourself the goal of performing your chosen gratitude
