

that's taking on new debt, changing your current account, dipping a toe in the water with investing – try to keep everything as streamlined as it needs to be in order not to overwhelm you. We each have different capacities for storing and acting on information, and those capacities will tend to fluctuate over the course of our lives as we have busier and quieter periods at work, our relationships change, our caring responsibilities change etc. Part of the process of getting to know yourself and learning to trust yourself in our first couple of steps feeds into this ability to decide what setup works for you. It's really important to be honest with yourself about what you can commit to, in terms of money, time and energy.

Part of this streamlining of your finances might be to create different accounts or pockets for different purposes, taking into account interest rates, accessibility and any reward schemes. There are so many different products out there, and such a huge amount of information about each one, that you might need to take some time to properly research before committing yourself, and that's okay. Being considered and mindful in our approach to money is a very key element of financial wellbeing.

Bearing in mind the fact that most of us have a lot of other things on our minds besides money, and that this is often one of the reasons why our finances become neglected and cause problems or may just not be working as hard for us as they should be, there's something to be said for automating
