

I'd heard so much about the health benefits, but I was worried that I wouldn't be good enough at it, that I'd make a fool of myself. I was also slightly concerned that the class was 75 minutes long, and that I might die if I had to exercise for that long all in one go. But then the class started, and all of my worries melted away. I realized that, for all of the glowing yogis that I saw, the actual yoga practice was just one building block in a much wider journey. That those snatched sessions a few times a week were not transforming any lives on their own, but instead acted as a catalyst for healthier living in general.

I started to see the effects of this myself, in real time. The more time I spent feeling connected with my body, the better I wanted to treat it. Not by cutting out food groups or doing gruelling exercise, but by making better and more mindful choices, incrementally. It happened almost by osmosis, with more caring choices becoming easier to opt for, semi-automatic.

My relationship with my body and my relationship with money are similar in their complexity, and there have been moments where they have existed as a perfect mirror image of one another. So, as I started to work on my relationship with money, the memory of this yoga phenomenon came back to me. I realized that if there are practices that can help you to feel more connected to your body, which act as a medium for building better habits, that there might be something similar for money too.