

pep talk, or writing a note from you right now to future you, to be opened in case of emergency. You could reaffirm your reasons for wanting to work towards financial wellbeing, or remind yourself of the progress you've already made. Put it in an envelope or in a folder on your computer, and forget about it until such a time as you need it.

Concluding thoughts for Step Three

So much of the progress that we make, whether in terms of our mindset, our attitude or our material circumstances, is based not in single actions or decisions that we make but in the small, inconspicuous things that we commit to doing every day. Anyone can decide to change their relationship with money or prioritize their financial wellbeing, but those who succeed in doing so will be those who manage to find a way to incorporate new practices into their everyday life, and who follow through on that commitment to fostering a more positive relationship with money. Once you learn to understand your current tendencies and patterns of behaviour, it becomes easier to break habits that are damaging your relationship with money and create new habits that will help you to repair it.

By making old habits difficult and unappealing, and taking steps to make new, desirable habits easy and enjoyable, we can create a situation whereby we are moving towards financial
