

wellbeing without having to constantly push – some of this progress will be fuelled by the momentum that we gain from this new set of habits, all of which will support and enhance one another. In reframing practices that we might previously have considered to be a chore, or at the very least life admin, as self-care, and in savouring the moments when we make positive choices for our money, we are looking after not only our finances but our general sense of wellbeing too.

Needless to say, this step can and should be broken down into smaller increments, and you will probably find that focussing on one or two habits at a time, rather than trying to redesign your whole approach to money in one fell swoop, will prove easier and more sustainable. I hope that once you've followed the exercises and considered the reasons behind each, you will have come up with a tailor-made framework for your new relationship with money, which will help you to withstand the pull of comparison, manipulative marketing and emotional spending, which we'll discuss in more detail in Step Four. I'll meet you there as soon as you're ready.
