

Five Steps to Financial Wellbeing

- How do you imagine it will feel to own this product? How do you imagine feeling when you wear, admire or sit on it?
- Are you distracted, or are you fully focussed on this decision?
- Do you actually want (or genuinely like) this product, or do you want to buy it because you hope that it will somehow change you or the way that you feel about yourself?
- Are you going to use and enjoy it right away? If not, why not wait a while?
- Is this purchase going to contribute to, or damage your wellbeing in the long term?
- Is this purchase in your best interests, or are you making it to please or impress someone else?

Getting into the habit of gently probing yourself before you make spending decisions will help you to be present and conscious in the moment, and if you repeat some or all of these questions to yourself as you ponder your purchases, eventually these criteria will become second nature, and mindful spending will become more automatic. Until then, follow your methods for habit-building, and you'll be fine.

Here are a few ways to create a better, easier environment for your mindful spending habits to thrive:
