

Safeguards against impulse spending:

- Unsubscribe from marketing emails and opt out of push notifications
- Delete shopping apps
- Remove your credit and debit card details from your device's autofill function
- Close 'buy now, pay later' accounts
- Sleep on non-essential purchase decisions
- Calculate how long it would take you to earn the money that you're about to spend
- Enlist a spending accountability buddy
- Have a phone curfew and use that time for self-care
- Keep a running list of things that you like, want or need

Saving for enjoyment

We've discussed the importance of saving rituals, and we'll go into more detail about the various ways in which you can save and invest for a bright financial future a little later on. This section, though, is about creating a fund of completely disposable money. Two of the big elements in a dysfunctional relationship with spending are guilt and anxiety. Both of these feelings can contribute to either a terrible fear of spending or a compulsion to overspend, or both. How we respond to those feelings of guilt and anxiety is individual to each of us, but our natural response is often something that will be in direct conflict with financial wellbeing.
