

it – there is no point paying for a massage when what you actually need is a nap, a glass of water, a favourite book and some nutritious vegetables – but if your mind and body are already feeling well-rested, well-nourished and well-hydrated, a massage can be a truly valuable experience.

As we each have difference circumstances, means and priorities, there is scope here for us to each create our own pyramid of needs based on our own lives, which can help us to identify any gaps lower down that can't be solved with a spa day. For a new (or even not-so-new) mum, there might be a huge gap where sleep should be, which is leading to a compulsion to buy things as compensation, while someone working long
