

for it in return, in the form of goods or services. There is a growing reluctance, among many of us, to buy from huge companies with billionaire owners and underpaid workers, and more awareness of our ability to vote for the world that we want via the money that we spend, bank and invest. Initiatives such as Black Pound Day and local or independent spending drives have educated us in what it means to contribute to the economies that we want to see thriving, as well as withholding our cash from those companies that would use it to pay huge dividends to shareholders rather than pay their staff a living wage.

Again, this type of thinking can be a welcome reframe when it comes to our purchasing, banking and investing decisions in the present, but it can also help us to plan for our own financial future and enrich our own financial wellbeing by seeing what happens when we work to redistribute wealth in the way that we use our money. Ethical money collective Good Money Week have identified the following things that you can do to direct your money towards more ethical channels, supporting causes such as the environment, human rights and equality, as you also work on your own financial future:¹

- Demand a clean and green pension – find out more about your pension provider, and ask to switch funds or even providers if your pension is being invested in causes with which you don't feel morally comfortable.
- Move your savings – even money in a simple savings account will give your chosen bank capital to invest and
