

If you don't know where to get started with your pension, here are a few quick pointers:

- Track down any old pension pots from 'previous jobs. There are an estimated 1.6 million lost pension pots in the UK, totalling £19.4 billion⁵ – don't let yours add to that figure! You can find old pensions using the tracker on gov.uk, but some pension providers have their own trackers, and will find and consolidate old pension pots for you.
- Add your pension provider(s) to that never-ending list of companies to update whenever you move house or change your name. It might take an extra half an hour at the time, but it'll save you time and worry later on.
- Ask your employer about your workplace pension. You could even ask them to bring your employee pension provider in to do a talk (this sounds like a snore-fest, I know, but a previous employer did this and it was genuinely fascinating).
- If you're self-employed, the statistics say that you probably don't have a pension. Time to change that – even if you're only paying in a small amount each month.
- Use a pension calculator (there are loads of different ones available) to work out what you need to save in order to comfortably retire.

This is absolutely not something that should be occupying your thoughts night and day, and checking your pension super-frequently or chopping and changing provider all the time is not going to contribute anything positive to your
