

we will be to deal with those occasions when they arise. There might be times when we are earning more money and times when we are earning less, times when life is very expensive and times when we are able to live more economically. But once we create an environment of financial wellbeing and a strong, engaged relationship with money, these things become easier to navigate. A well-established system, whereby you aren't carrying excessive financial baggage, don't hang your self-worth on your financial situation, have rituals and habits to offer stability, feel in control of your spending and are mindful of the future – i.e. our five steps – will make you resilient to financial changes, large and small. When life throws you a financial curveball, you will have a safety net of beliefs, coping mechanisms and practical techniques to catch you.

Concluding thoughts for Step Five

Although much of our financial wellbeing is rooted in being present in the moment, creating habits to support us and feeling grateful for what we have, creating for ourselves a plan and a safety net for the future is also absolutely vital. We all know that things rarely go exactly to plan, but by having an outline for how you'd like to proceed with your finances, and the role that you'd like money to play in your future, you have a central point to pivot from when circumstances change.

There is certainly a balance to be struck between enjoying the money that you earn, and ensuring that you feel fulfilled and
