

- Giving reasons might feel important to you, and it might help to give the other person some much-needed context, which can actually help to reduce the hurt that they are feeling. However, it's important not to drag these out too much, because then you risk making this apology all about you, and you might start to invalidate the other person's feelings without meaning to. Simply briefly explain the circumstances surrounding the mistake, and reassure the other person that your actions weren't a reflection of how much you value them.
- Where there are actual amends to be made, in the form of money that needs to be paid back or trust that needs to be rebuilt, make sure that you enter the conversation with a plan for that. You can then propose this to the other person – but bear in mind that it's up to them whether or not they accept it.

Most people really appreciate a sincere apology, and most people also realize that money can be a tricky topic to discuss. Just remember that the other person doesn't have to accept your apology or forgive you, and that this shouldn't be your motivation for apologizing to them. You're not trying to achieve absolution, you are trying to express how sorry you are. Despite the fact that you're taking this step in pursuit of your own sense of financial wellbeing, this part is not really for you, it's for them.