

member that confidence in your ability to make the right decisions is absolutely essential to a good relationship with money. Allow yourself to be open to this and it will pay dividends, maybe literally.

There are lots of ways to access meditation, from practising by yourself to guided classes and apps. It can be quite difficult to find the discipline or space needed to just start meditating on your own, especially if you don't have access to a cupboard like Glennon Doyle's, but the market for mindfulness tools is booming. Apps such as Headspace and Calm are well established and well-loved – Open Up author Alex Holder even has a Mindful Money course on Headspace – while the Clementine hypnotherapy app has courses to help reduce internal chatter and soothe self-doubt. Meanwhile, guided meditation can be accessed in person or digitally via lots of different channels – check what's available in your local authority. If you'd like to give it a go yourself, here are a couple of meditation exercises you can do to get started – just bear in mind that it might take a little while to access that state, and be patient.

A meditation exercise for self-trust

1. Find a safe, quiet space, and make sure you're comfortable. You can sit, stand or lie down – whatever feels good for you.
2. Close your eyes if that feels okay – otherwise you can practise a 'soft gaze', where you look ahead but allow
