

your vision to slide out of focus, so that you're not looking at one particular spot.

3. Focus on your breath, but just allow it to be as it is. Don't actively try to deepen it or slow it down artificially – you'll probably find that this happens naturally as you start to relax.
4. When you feel things start to settle, place either one or both of your hands on your heart or belly. This will allow you to feel more centred in yourself, which is a key element of self-trust.
5. Now, gently bring to mind a situation in which you feel that you might need guidance. It's probably best not to start with a huge, life-changing decision, rather something a little bit easier, and with lower stakes.
6. One by one, imagine the different actions that you could take, and explore the things that you feel when you bring each one to mind. You might have a strong emotional reaction in one direction or another, or you might feel nothing.
7. If you feel nothing for a particular option, this is probably an indicator to let that option go.
8. Strong feelings might take a longer time to decipher, but you will likely feel your consciousness push you in a particular direction. Take some time to ponder each of these options in a non-judgemental way until you start to feel a sense of certainty.
