

Five Steps to Financial Wellbeing

9. When you hit upon something solid, be aware of your breathing and how you feel. Just because something is the right decision for you, doesn't mean that it's an easy one. But remember that we can all do hard things.
10. Close your practice with a feeling of gratitude – to yourself for setting aside the time to meditate, and to your consciousness for guiding you in making this decision.

The more that you do this, the quicker you'll be able to access that certainty in daily life without having to slip into your meditative state. When you strengthen your decision-making muscles, you make it easier to trust yourself.

As well as the work that you do internally to discover and trust your own judgement, you also need to start putting that decisiveness into practice – even if you have to 'fake it 'til you make it'. Practise asserting yourself with people that you trust, and see how it feels to put your own financial wellbeing first in situations where there's a choice between what's easy and what's right for you. We'll talk about this more in Step Two, where we explore the relationship between people-pleasing and financial wellbeing.
