

2. Charities (some offer free counselling and/or telephone listening services). Go have a google!
3. If you are a student, most universities and colleges have free counselling services.
4. Through medical insurance (your own or sometimes you can also access therapy through your partner's, depending on the policy).
5. Through a workplace Employee Assistance Programme. Often you won't even need to say a word to your manager or HR.
6. Online services/apps (please ensure the therapists are registered with a professional body).
7. Ask if a private therapist offers a sliding fee scale or takes on any pro bono cases.
8. Try group therapy, as this is often at a lower cost.
9. Space out your private sessions to give yourself time to save up, or consider batching in 6-week chunks if you prefer the weekly check-in.

Concluding thoughts for Step One

One of the huge material benefits of making peace with your mistakes, and unpacking your financial baggage, is that when you are no longer distracted, or even paralyzed, by feelings of self-blame and shame, it becomes much easier to take positive action towards developing a better relationship with money. For some, smaller or comparatively historical mistakes, you
