

The emotional side of investing

Let's be honest, investing isn't always exciting. In fact, when it comes to building wealth over the long term, boring is often best. Just as we want to be lazy investors — let's also be boring investors!

That might sound strange, especially when we're surrounded by stories of people making big money overnight, social media posts about 'hot' investments, or constant headlines about market booms and busts. It's easy to get caught up in the noise. It's easy to feel like you're missing out or like you're not doing it 'right.'

But successful investing is about consistency.

There will be moments of boredom, moments of fear when markets dip, and plenty of times when it seems like everyone else is doing better than you. This is completely common. The emotional side of investing can be the biggest challenge for many people, especially when faced with the temptation to chase quick wins or react to short-term market swings.

One of the fastest ways to lose focus is through comparison. Watching what others are doing, measuring your progress against someone else's, or feeling pressure to 'keep up' can lead to impulsive decisions that don't align with your personal goals.

The key is to stay in your own lane. This is your journey, your timeline and your version of success. Consistency, patience and sticking to your plan, especially when it feels boring, are what separate successful investors from those who get caught up in the market's ups and downs.

And remember: your money tree doesn't grow because you constantly dig it up to check the roots. It grows because you water it regularly and give it time.

Need a little excitement in your investing life? This one is for you!

Okay, I get it, not everyone wants to be lazy and boring. If you're someone who enjoys a bit of excitement or wants to explore other investment ideas without throwing your whole plan off course, there's a strategy for that too. It's called the Core-Satellite approach.