

Tracking your progress

Once you've set your Lazy 3 Portfolio investing plan in motion, the next question is usually how do I know if I'm on track? The good news is you don't need to become obsessed with checking your portfolio every day. In fact, for most people, less is more.

Here are some tips for keeping on track:

- Set up regular contributions and let automation do the heavy lifting. This removes emotion and keeps your momentum going.
- Use simple investing apps or online dashboards to check in from time to time.
- Track your numbers on a spreadsheet if you enjoy the detail and want a clear picture of your progress.

Another useful tool is tracking your net worth over time. Your net worth is simply what you own (your assets like savings, investments, retirement plans and property) minus what you owe (debts like loans or credit cards). Watching your net worth grow can be incredibly motivating because it shows the bigger picture beyond just your bank account or investments. Some months it will dip, some months it will climb, that's normal, but the goal is to see it growing over the long term.

There's no perfect approach. The most important thing? Keep going. You've planted your first seed for your first tree. Now give it time to grow, stay consistent, and trust the process.

You're now an investor!

You've just done something many people never do. You've taken the first step. And while it might not feel like much right now, this $1000 is your ticket to building financial independence (and a whole lot more confidence) over time.

That first $1000 is worth celebrating. It's proof that you can do it. It shows you have the ability to save, to take action, and to think about your future self. And from here, the next step is simple: keep going.
