

secure, or may be you want to roam around the world, or pursue your hobbies, or open up your own venture. I do not know your reason. I do not know what drives you. And it is not even important for me to know it, as long as the fire is burning deep inside you – a fire to reject ordinary life and embrace a different and extraordinary life.

I keep reading more and more articles about how people are contributing to the society, country or world once they become financially free.

The following is an article, which appeared in a national newspaper on Azim Premji, the founder of Wipro.

“After chipping in for the country's educational system for a decade, the Azim Premji Foundation (APF), run by the third richest Indian on his own money, is all set for a generous initiative. The foundation plans to start 1,300 schools across the country—two per district which will be free, impart education in the local language and be affiliated to the state board.

If the idea succeeds, it could shame India's dysfunctional public education system and perhaps inspire other wealthy tycoons to look beyond their personal status-building.”

There are many articles that are published daily and there are a greater number of people today trying to do "seemingly impossible" things after they have attained their goal of financial freedom. While Bill Gates, Bill Clinton and other big names have their own NGOs and their own way of helping millions across the world, there are many unknown people and organisations who are helping others in their own way.

You have got to find your own reason for financial freedom, but once the reason is clear in your mind, you will look at life in a completely different way. You will see a life that is not only worthwhile but also awesome.

John Lennon, an English musician, singer and song writer who rose to worldwide fame as one of the founding members of The Beatles, one of the most commercially successful and critically acclaimed acts in the history of popular music and who, along with fellow Beatle, Paul McCartney, formed one of the most successful song writing partnerships of the 20th century, shares the following views on happiness:
