

1.05 = ₹52,500/-. You are now earning ₹2,500/- through margins (extra income). This entire ₹2,500/- can be saved since your expenses were already covered by your regular income. So now, you can save ₹5,000/- (which you were already saving earlier) + ₹2,500/- (extra income that can be saved) = ₹7,500/-.

Look at it carefully. Now your savings that go to building your corpus have gone up by 50% (₹7,500/- in place of ₹5,000/-) which increases your speed of journey in almost the same proportion. A 5% increase in extra income leads to almost 50% jump in corpus savings. Isn't this powerful and incredible? It is. But no one cares for it, because it is too good and too simple to be true. Unfortunately, what most people miss out is that the most powerful things are also the simplest.

The same is true about ideas that keep coming to us. All too often, we discount these ideas just because they seem too obvious or simple to us. In doing so, we tend to forget that the most brilliant ideas are almost always simple in concept. None of us will ever achieve anything extraordinary except when we listen to the whispers of our heart.

There are hundreds of examples of how people started off with a very simple idea and became an instant success. It could be as simple and huge as McDonalds which started selling burgers. There was really nothing new in the idea but it was implemented so well that it is the largest such chain in the world. Another, more recent example is Facebook, a virtual place where we meet our friends across the globe, to chat, share and have fun together. Neither was selling burgers an extraordinary new idea nor was chatting and sharing with friends. But both these ideas grew into phenomenal successes.

I am not saying that you have to build a business to reach this level of success. Neither am I saying that all ideas will always lead to the success that McDonalds or Facebook enjoy. What I am saying is that we must follow the whispers of our hearts and take them forward and try them out rather than holding them back. There will obviously be obstacles, issues, struggles and failures as you move forward, but this is the only way you move forward.

You could also say that all these people who succeeded were lucky. Of course they were lucky. Anyone who says that he or she could achieve
