

days of career planning and intensive studying. Not many in this age group would have the mental maturity and foresight to even read this book. If you are wondering why this section has been included in such a case, let me tell you that if you are having children in this age group (and I know that many of you seeking financial freedom would have that), then you must understand how a portfolio build up should happen in this age group.

- When we were this age, we were not fortunate enough to be informed or taught about wealth management or building a portfolio. But having experienced the magical powers of time leveraging and compounding now, this is one age group where you can leverage these extreme powers to the maximum.
- As parents, it is one of our prime responsibilities to make sure that our children in this age group understand the following:
 - Huge wealth creation takes time. And time is what this age group has in their hands.
 - The earlier they start, the less effort they have to put in to build massive wealth.
 - They need not wait to start earning money through jobs or business to be able to invest and create assets or to start building a portfolio. Since time needs to be leveraged, they should start with a part of their pocket money.
 - They can start with having a bank account at a young age. Now a days, our government allows children with 10+ years of age to have an independent bank account. However, I would recommend that you get an under-guardian bank account set up for your kids as soon as you can. Ideally, they should handle money from the day they know how to count numbers.
 - Show the account statement of their own bank account to them and explain how the bank pays interest on the deposited money. Tell them that this is how their "money works for them". Money generates more money. This is the first learning they should have at this stage of life.
