

Step 8: Celebrate milestones with your family

Always keep in mind that no one can achieve anything of one's own efforts only. There are innumerable sacrifices (heard or unheard) that go in making one person successful. It is time to honour those who helped you relentlessly.

You have planned well and started your journey towards achieving one of the biggest milestones in life – your own freedom. Just as with any stock market fluctuation, this journey will have its own ups and downs, moments of cheer and excitement as well as moments of sadness and depression.

I heard a statement repeatedly while I was doing network marketing with Amway, which says: If your goals and dreams are big enough, facts don't count.

So very true. It does not matter what your family income is today, whether you are unable to save as per the target you have set for yourself, whether you started too late or whether you started some time earlier in life and failed. It doesn't matter what your near and dear feel about your dreams and goals. Nothing matters at all! The only thing that matters is what you feel about what you are trying to achieve and what you want to do once you have achieved financial freedom.

Your relatives and friends will join your journey when they understand it. I can tell you one thing for sure. The day they understand it, they will be your biggest supporters and in fact they will be the ones who will encourage you when you feel your goals are eluding you.

But remember that your close family sacrifices as much, if not more than you do. You are sacrificing because you have a definite goal and you know how to achieve it. Your family may not even know and understand your goal, but still supports you, which must be duly appreciated.

To involve them in your goals, as well as to realize the importance of each step, you must make it a definite point to celebrate the intermediate milestones with your family. For example, I remember that during my
