

through Shylock and Brutus' characters. We read the Indian biggies - romanticize worship, loyalty and ethics through Ramayana and Mahabharata. In the personal finance world, one folklore remains a favorite. It goes like this:

A wealthy and successful American businessman works through a deal and achieves a major breakthrough for his company. He is duly awarded with a huge bonus and paid-time-off to celebrate the occasion. As he packs his bags, he hasn't decided on where he wants to go. An impromptu decision at the airport gets him on the flight to Mexico and hours later, he is inside bright and sunny Cancun. Hotel rooms booked, bags settled and body refreshed in the expensive shower, he heads to the coast to surf in the sea. As he approaches the sand, he notices a Mexican, laid back on a ledge, dreaming, with a hat over his head and beer in his hand. A sexy boat is anchored to the ledge on which the Mexican is slanted.

The American says, "Nice boat. Do you know the owner?"

Mexican: "Si senior. It's mine"

American: "Wow. Would you like to go around? Tell me how much for the evening?"

Mexican: "200 pesos' senior"

American: "That's not much. You know you've got a prime spot and could charge more per ride?"

Mexican: "And then do what, senior?"

American: "Make some money, maybe buy another boat"

Mexican: "And then what, senior?"

American: "You hire people to handle the boat. You start a company, market your company, put yourself as a tour operator across America"

Mexican: "And then what, senior?"

American: "Damn, you must be dull. If you've built a business with people working under you, then you buy a home and drink beer all day. Ha, that's my dream when I retire"

Mexican: "Senior, what do you think I do every-day?"

Some of us can recognize our calling (what we wish to or are meant to do) while still in school but may or may not be able to pursue it in college.
