

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Beth Kobliner has been writing and speaking on personal finance for more than fifteen years. She was a staff writer at Money magazine for eight years, wrote the money column for Glamour magazine for six, and has also contributed numerous articles to the New York Times. A regular on television and radio, she has appeared several times on Oprah to talk about personal finance and has been a repeat commentator on CNN, MSNBC, NBC's Today show, CBS, ABC, and various PBS and NPR programs, including public radio's Marketplace. She began her career researching and writing more than one hundred columns for the personal finance pioneer Sylvia Porter, whose syndicated column appeared in over 150 newspapers nationwide.

Kobliner has also been an active spokesperson for the financial concerns of Americans in their twenties and thirties; she frequently speaks to college and corporate audiences, addressing a range of topics including credit card debt, student loan policy, investing, and long-term savings. She sits on the board of the Women's Institute for a Secure Retirement (WISER) and has testified before a U.S. Senate policy committee on young people's attitudes toward Social Security. She is an honorary advisor to the National Academy of Social Insurance and was a member of the Center for Strategic and International Studies' National Commission on Retirement Policy.

Kobliner graduated from Brown University and lives with her husband and three children in New York City.
