

will have to accept the idea that this has been done by others and that they can do it. Wealth ALWAYS begins in the mind.

Wealth always begins with a mind-concept of wealth-potential. Putting farms aside, you can trace any fortune back to this one principle.

When you seek enough, therefore, look first into the mind that interprets the world around it. It is in your mind that you not only conceive the kind and amount of wealth you want; it is also in your mind that you take the raw stuff of circumstance and make it into opportunity.

Peace of mind is wealth. I have not made the above statement before in exactly those words, but I am sure they do not surprise you.

The principle is so important that I shall give you yet another story about a man who was wealthy in money but did not know how poor he was because he did not have peace of mind. Also, he did not know what he was missing until he found it. And in order to find peace of mind, he had to abandon a business principle and substitute a human-kindness principle which he always had sneered at—so you can see, this shapes up into a pretty important true story.

The hero is . . . but who is the hero of this story? You have to decide for yourself. At any rate, a major character is a man who had made a fortune in real estate, largely through the rental of cheap property he owned. He found one aging couple to be long in arrears in their rent, and so, following his invariable principle of "good business," he decided to evict them.

He told his lawyer to follow through on the procedure. The lawyer, however, did not present him with an accomplished eviction, so the property owner and the lawyer had a talk.

The lawyer said: "I shan't press your claim. You can get someone else to take the case, unless you'd rather withdraw it."

The property owner decided he knew what was on the lawyer's mind. "So you think there isn't any money in it?"

"Oh, there'd be some little money in it, since I understand you want to sell the house once it's empty. But I don't want the case anyway."

The property owner wondered what was going on. "Did you get frightened out of it?"
