

Like Henry Ford or Thomas Edison, these successful men of today believed and achieved. Their belief showed them the way to their achievement. So it was with Columbus. So it was with Paul of Tarsus. So it can be with you.

The art of auto-suggestion is completely self-contained. We shall see it clearly, in plain print, in a moment. First ask yourself: What do I want? This is not a question to be answered lightly. What do you want? Once more I give you a list to aid your thinking:

Improvement of your general health

Improvement of some specific health or functional factor

Cure of any bad habit

Abolishment of fear

The ability to transmute sex energy

The ability to find the right mate in marriage

Weight reduction or gain

The ability to break away from outworn customs or outmoded ways of life

The ability to get along better with other people

The ability to sway others to your way of thinking

Inner guidance in the selection of a business or profession

Money

When you know what you want, you are ready to go after it. You need a Definite Chief Aim. Vague mind-conceptions are little better than mere wishes. Decide where you are going—then, and only then do you begin to see the signposts that point the way.

You are going to make money, and I trust you to see it as only one form of wealth—but, as I have pointed out, a form of wealth which helps us attain many others. The chances are that you automatically accept money as a goal, so let us take this goal as a prototype in illustrating auto-suggestion.

How much money do you want to make? You will recall the stories of W. Clement Stone and other men who set up specific sums of money as their goal and attained the ownership of those sums. They did not fill their minds with thoughts of the difficulties in their way, nor the menace of competition. They believed they would make money . . . they achieved what they went after.

Now, this is the way to use auto-suggestion to help you
