

The standard of living in many countries is higher than it has ever been. The wealth brought by modern industry and technology means that many people have more than they need, but at the same time, billions of people are living in poverty. One of the problems economists are dealing with is how to distribute the wealth more fairly, helping poorer countries to develop and encouraging economic growth.