

The goods that we need are supplied by businesses, such as the agricultural and manufacturing industries, and sold to us through markets. The price we pay for them—how much we value them—depends on how scarce or plentiful the resources are, how much demand there is for these goods, and whether this demand is being met by the supply.