

Objects of desire

Goods are the things that people need or want, that will be useful to them, or that they consider desirable. But more than that, they are things that they consider valuable enough to exchange money for, to purchase. Because there are people who want to buy these goods, there will be other people who make their living from supplying them. The supply side of the market, as opposed to the demand side—the customers—is made up of many different kinds of business, all producing different kinds of goods. For example, there are farmers who provide agricultural goods such as crops and livestock produced from working the land. There are also businesses that use the land to provide other necessary goods. Mining companies, for example, extract the raw materials for making metals, and other minerals from the ground. Other companies mine for coal, or drill for oil and gas that can be used to provide our energy.

Manufactured goods

Aside from food, the majority of goods that we buy are manufactured goods. That is, they have been made from raw materials, in a factory, or by a craftsman. Manufacturing industries produce a huge range of capital goods and consumer goods, from necessities such as clothes, through household
