

The paradox of value

Some things that have very little practical use, such as diamonds, are valued more highly than essentials such as water.