

were estimated by the researchers to have managed most of their household finances through banking services at Chase (debit and credit cards, paying mortgages through a bank account, etc.). In analyzing the expenditures for their diverse consumer base, they outlined four retirement spending profiles and an additional category of miscellaneous individuals. These are the profiles they found:

Foodies (39 percent of households): The largest category of the population tends to be fairly frugal in retirement, with the lowest overall spending. The category name comes from the fact that 28 percent of their expenditures are in the food and beverage category, including purchases at large box stores or online retailers. Foodies tend to have lower housing expenditures, as they have paid off their mortgage and have limited property taxes. Foodies also tend to spend less as they age. The authors conclude that while foodies should separately account for health expenditures, they can otherwise reasonably plan for their spending to decrease as they continue through retirement. As will be clearer after describing the other categories, foodies may be the only group that can plan to be reasonably well served by a retirement spending smile expenditure pattern.

Homebodies (29 percent of households): This group tends to spend much more on housing in retirement than others. Some may still have a mortgage, but even for homebodies without mortgages, there can be significant expenses for property taxes, ongoing maintenance, repairs, furnishings, and utilities. Homebodies may be maintaining a large home, and their expenses may be more likely to keep pace with inflation. For instance, as homebodies age, they may require greater expenditures on home maintenance and chores for activities they are no longer able to manage on their own. For homebodies, getting a sense of future retirement expenses can require making clear plans about future housing: When will the mortgage be paid? Is there a second home that may be sold? What portion of the budget consists of property taxes and utility bills? What are future plans for downsizing or further renovating the home?

Globetrotters (5 percent of households): This category of households spends much more on travel and has the highest overall expenditures of any category. Globetrotters represent 11 to 13 percent of households with at least
