

politics especially) is more than just a poor construct, it is a lazy way to cover anything. It lacks insight; it oversimplifies; and as you can see, it ages very poorly.

Investors can be wrong about lots of things, but it's much more than our batting average. Your concern should be that overconfidence will cause you trouble. Studies reveal we believe those exhibiting excess confidence much more than we should. It serves us poorly.

One last case study on magazine cover stories: Nokia. Then, we can move on to the lessons of media stock picking...

94 Jon Fortt, "Forget the iPhone: BlackBerry is still the one to beat," Fortune (August 24, 2007).

95 "Nostalgia calling: BlackBerry had a good quarter, but it had nothing to do with phones," chartr.co (June 30, 2023).