

know they have blind spots and are aware they don't know what they don't know.

The process by which you make decisions is worth examining. Whether we are thinking about important milestones in life or our asset allocation, we cannot let our decision-making run on its default setting.

Our definition of investing depends on recognizing what we do and don't know about the future. We want to make better decisions that will withstand whatever might occur. To do that, we need to ask ourselves what we believe and why. That is what we do next.
