

visits the doctor twice for office visits ($25 per visit) and once for a preventative service ($15), her out-of-pocket expenses for the year will be a whopping $65. On the other hand, her deductible and out-of-pocket max are pretty high, which means she is running the risk of spending a lot of money if she were to get sick or injured.

Chronically sick and often-injured Carter should definitely choose Option 3. While her monthly premium is quite high, she has a very low $250 deductible and she can rest a bit easier knowing that her out-of-pocket maximum for covered services is only $2,000. With a $200 monthly premium, she is guaranteed to pay at the very least $2,400 ($200 per month for 12 months) for her yearly medical services, but for someone who is likely going to need a lot of medical coverage, it is worth it.

Meghan may want to consider Option 2. She has a pretty affordable premium, and it also comes with a much lower deductible than Option 1. Also, because she participates in extreme sports, she may find comfort in knowing that her covered emergency services will be capped at $250, instead of a percentage of a potentially large bill.
