

You probably will not get the car at $13,000, but it may end up at a compromise of $14,000.

- Get an out-the-door price in writing. The out-the-door price is the total cost with all taxes and fees. The discussions about prices and financing are just verbal agreements. Until you get a formal offer in writing, you will not know the exact price of your car.
- Don't be afraid to walk. If you are uncomfortable, nervous, unhappy, or just need more time to think, let the salesperson know and get out of there. Don't let your fear of seeming impolite force you into a horrible and lasting financial decision.

Things to Avoid

Like being on a first date with someone you met on the internet, you should be looking out for red flags when buying a car. Here are a few things you should be on the lookout for when shopping for a car.

Poor reviews. In addition to researching the cars you are interested in buying, you should look into the dealerships you might work with. If the Yelp reviews are filled with low ratings and complaints against the salespeople, you should probably steer clear. That being said, read through a negative review carefully and try to determine if the reviewer has a legitimate beef with the dealership, or they are just a crazy person who wasn't given a car at a 50% discount.

Pushy or disrespectful salespeople. If the salesperson is making you feel rushed or disrespected, walk away. Despite the stress that inevitably comes with this situation, the car-buying
